Your Yes Vote

- would only allow people already long separated to re-marry

  "At least four years" the amendment says - surely enough time to enable a serious attempt at reconciliation by both parties. This is no 'easy' route to divorce. And divorce is never an easy option.

- would end the present financial and social discrimination against these people and their children

  Couples in second stable relationships suffer unfairly under the present tax system, and do not enjoy the financial security of 'legal' families. Is this "cherishing all of our children equally" ?

Help the Separated Re-shape their lives

- would complete the existing Family Law legislation that protects children and spouses

  We have come a long way since the previous referendum in terms of legal protection for those involved in marriage breakdown. All of the concerns rightly expressed at that time have been addressed in the intervening years by enlightened legislation. It only remains now for the final logical step - to remove the legal limbo and allow the reasonable right to re-marry.

- would show compassion for the less fortunate

  Over 75,000 'married' Irish people are now separated and the figure is growing. That is the reality whether we like it or not. Your 'Yes' vote on 24th November will not change that reality. But it will enable those people - some the victims of violent or abusive relationships to aspire with their children to a happy family life that the law and society recognises and supports.

Who would deny them that opportunity ?
